HELLO

Hiring Manager,

I must preface my introduction by saying that it would be an honor to work with consummate professionals the level of which I've rarely seen elsewhere in the tech field. That said, I am forwarding my candidacy with the hope of serious consideration for the role of UI Engineer which you are currently looking to fill.

My abilities are numerous, and not all fully represented on the brief attached résumé. I spent several years freelancing or taking short-term contract work following the completion of my studies in Digital Media in 2006. In 2013, I transitioned from freelance to corporate work, at which point I impressed my hirers with my clean and readable code and keen eye for design. During this point I designed and built many ad campaigns for a plethora of clients, working in a full-scale agency capacity. The work was steady and turnarounds were often necessarily quick. Within 8 months I became a manager there, and not only built out campaigns but collaborated across teams in both Los Angeles and Singapore, and ensuring deliverable deadlines were met.

In 2019, I took on a new role in a larger company, but with a smaller setting and continue to provide these services. My employment here is rewarding, however, I have during this time continued my education through Lambda School and have added to my skillset React, Redux, Node.js, Python & PostgreSQL. I'm looking to transition to a role where I may expand the usage of these skills in a more fulfilling way.

As I say, from my experience at Lambda School, I've learned many things, not the least of which is that initiative is a valued trait in a team setting. My experience in the design and in management allowed me to manage deliverables from both the UX/UI teams, as well as to architect the front end requirements and task breakdowns into manageable bits.

My general attitude toward learning is that what skills and knowledge I currently possess may scarcely dent the void I hope to fill. I'm an everyday student, and I learn from everyone I meet. I will always be self-improving, but finding my place within your organization would be a most valuable and, I am certain, mutually beneficial experience.

I look forward to our future communications, whatever they may bring, and am excited for the opportunity.

Sincerely
Aaron Johnson
